Merger

They also think that by relying on the city department's tracking software, they'll get a much better idea of how the county's vehicles are used, enabling them to tinker with maintenance intervals and perhaps downsize the fleet.

Ruffin recently discussed the proposal with Hill and learned that the sheriff and his people "don't trust" the city department to do repairs and preventive maintenance as well as Hendrick.

But Fleet Maintenance

already handles the same tasks for the Durham Police Department. "It's their right to feel that way, but I don't think there's any basis in fact for that," Ruffin said, referring to the sheriff's assessment of the city's capabilities.

County administrators have also signaled that they have concerns of their own when it comes to how well they think the sheriff is overseeing vehicle maintenance for his department.

Briefing papers given to County Commissioners claim that Hendrick has been marking up parts prices 150 percent over wholesale. Administrators also said it looked to them that Hill hadn't acted on county Internal Audit Director Richard Edwards' request that the sheriff periodically audit Hendrick's work.

The county staff's confidence in Hill's financial management has waned in recent years thanks in part to discoveries that a civilian employee and a narcotics lieutenant had embezzled a combined $210,976 from the sheriff's office.

A report last year by Edwards said poor supervision had contributed to the thefts.
